That fire played a horrible part after the collision is indicated by the stories her started with a of the wreck. But for that the death bring quick results, lst would have been much while everything points to the fact that there was a lax method of giving orders for the operation of the trains or a gross disregard of orders by the enginears, Coming together head-on, the collision couldn't have occurred at a worst point. There was no opportunity for the engineers to see their danger as they swung around a sharp cut in a deep cut, but what the investigation which is bound to follow such a wreck will be easer to determine is why two traign should be andeavoring to pass on

These were trains that were running on the regular schedule and there should been a definite point fixed at which they should pass, with orders to that affect in the hands of both. Whether such was the method pursued will be illudiceed by the investigation, as well as the reason why if orders were given such were not obeyed. For an angineer to assume that he had waited long mough after remaining on a siding ten nimites and then proceed does not indicate good justiment.
